From Shelter to Sanctuary *Healthy Habitats for Pets

Toronto, ON—June 1, 2007— June is Adopt-a-Cat Month in Canada. It's easy to adopt, thanks to the tireless work of shelters across the country, and it's easy for people and pets alike to adapt.

The Cambridge & District Humane Society, for example, takes in some 1,000 cats per year. Thanks to the Internet, where they post each animal's photo, and strong support from area pet stores, which showcase many of the animals, this OSPCA-affiliate has a great placement rate, keeping animals for generally no more than four days.

Many animals come to shelters from loving homes where health issues like allergies or a move into long-term care forces their owners to give them up. Others come to shelters from animal control authorities, some as strays, some in need of specialized care.

In fact, that's why the Cambridge & District Humane Society got a pet enclosure system last year from The Cat's Den, part of the wholesome pet lifestyle from Habitat Haven.

"We use our pet enclosure as a sort of sanctuary to help strays make the transition from living outside to living in a new home," says its executive director Bonnie Deekon. "Also some animals, say with upper respiratory illness, need to be outside for a while to get well," she explains.

Habitat Haven regularly partners with local animal shelters to support pet adoption at trade shows across North America. Its sturdy easy-to-assemble modular pet enclosures are available in a number of do-it-yourself configurations or can be custom-installed to fit any site, whether a house, apartment, condo, trade show or pet store.

Pet owners across North America have found this the perfect way to give their pets room to roam in their own yard (not the neighbour's!), free from the dangers of predators, falls, or traffic.
